ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The authors wish to recognize and to thank many people for their help in preparing this guide. Among the individuals who have given freely of their time, good advice and support are: COL Frank Foster, Linda Foster and 1st LT Lee Foster of Medals of America; Jack McPherson of Lancer Militaria; Don McGrogan; Ira Newman of Action Embroidery Co. and Jim DiRosa of Quartermaster Uniform Co.. Special thanks goes to Duane Neyens of Battle Dress Unlimited for permitting use of his extensive collection of US Marine Corps patches.

We also deeply appreciate the efforts of COL (Ret) Gerald T. Luchino, Director of the U.S. Army Institute of Heraldry and Mr. Thomas B. Proffitt, Chief, Heraldic Services and Support Division of the U.S. Army Institute of Heraldry and their staff for their courtesy in reviewing the material for accuracy and content.

And the most sincere thanks to Sara Morgan and Lana Thurman for their encouragement, support, help and patience with Pete and Ted while they spent many long hours assembling, cataloging, collating, scanning and computerizing the entire collection.

Of course, the most praise must go to the people who enjoy and collect patches. This book is for you and we hope that it is some help in increasing your enjoyment and that it will serve not only as a reference source but also as an aid in accumulating and cataloging your collection.

This is the first edition of this work. We hope to have several more. Any errors are the fault of the authors and we apologize in advance. If you have new or different designs that we may incorporate in future editions, or if you would like to discuss anything herein, including sources where to obtain patches for your use, please contact the authors:

A Few Words About Patches In General - And This Book In Particular

While the idea of using a shoulder sleeve insignia to identify a particular unit in the field had its' American start in the civil war, its' U.S. Army rebirth in the twentieth century was not without controversy. The story is told that in October of 1918 in France, the 81st "Wildcat" division began wearing an olive-drab circle with the black representation of a wildcat thereon. The design was to represent that the division had trained at Camp Jackson in South Carolina on the banks of Wildcat Creek. General Pershing felt that this was detrimental to uniform discipline and ordered that the patch be removed. After his staff studied the situation a bit further, it was found that the idea of each unit having a unique design on their uniform had a positive morale effect on the troops, and, trench warfare being what it was in WW I , the army needed all the positive effect it could find.

Being fairly smart (and, after all, he was the Commanding General), Pershing then ordered that all units should design a shoulder sleeve insignia and proceed to wear it on their uniforms. This gave a feeling to the individual that he was a member of a particular group and should take pride in the special accomplishments of that unit. Thus, began the army's headlong rush into insignia design. Soon, every unit had to have their own distinguishing marks on everything from the individual soldier to vehicles, equipment and in some cases, even buildings.

With the advent of WW II and the resulting explosive buildup of the military, shoulder sleeve insignia (SSI) designs proliferated. Hundreds of new designs appeared almost overnight. Designs were coming in from the units themselves, along with professional designs from Hollywood and New York. An entire industry sprang up almost overnight of designers, embroiderers, distributors and of course, collectors.

The purpose of this book is to provide a military reference source concentrating primarily on U.S. Army designs where most shoulder sleeve insignia originated. However, we have incorporated some of the most popular U.S. Navy and U.S. Marine Corps designs that will be encountered. Keep in mind that in 1947 with the advent of the realignment of the armed services, several major changes occurred. The U.S. Air Force was created and separated from Army control to become an independent entity and the U.S. Marine Corps ceased wearing patches on uniforms.

Future volumes will portray the U.S. Air Force patches. We have included a section in this book to illustrate some of the "Unofficially Authorized" patches prevalent in the U.S. Marine Corps today.

There are many unofficial and variant designs in this book. It is simply because these patches are present today and will undoubtedly be encountered. We have made no distinction between "original" and "reproduction" designs. This is an ongoing debate best left to those who revel in it.

With certain exceptions, the patches pictured in this book are from the author's collection. We hope that you gain as much enjoyment from the hobby as we have. GOOD HUNTING!

Patch Production Through The Years

Methods of construction and material used in making patches have been extremely varied over the years. From the most basic techniques to the highly sophisticated computer operations, the goal has always been to produce a design that someone can wear with pride and purpose.

Illustration #1

Originally, appliques were simply colored bits of cloth sewn together to make a design that met the need. (illustration #1) This led to the designs being embroidered on bits of uniform cloth. First by hand, (Illustration #2) and later, with the development of machines, mass production became the norm.

Early patches were made by machine with the design drawn on the fabric and the maker simply followed the drawing using a single needle. This is a crude method, and takes a skilled operator to produce an accurate design. This is commonly seen on in-country made Vietnam era patches (Illustration #3)

Illustration #2

Illustration #3

Illustration #4

In the beginning, the most popular fabrics used were usually old bits of uniform on which the design was embroidered. Then, the design was cut out and stitched on the soldier's uniform. The development of the Schiffli machine in the late 19th century permitted the use of bolts or rolls of base fabric with as many as 360 needles embroidering as one. By the time of WWII, the Schiffli stitch had become the standard method by which most all US military patches were produced. Because the machine was developed in Switzerland, this is sometimes referred to as "Swiss" embroidery. The bobbins are shaped like double-ended boats, hence, the term "Schiffli" (German: "Little Boat"). An example of the schiffli stitch is shown in illustration #4.

Another 19th century invention that was used to produce patches in large volume was the Jacquard weaving machine. This method of weaving was developed in France and employed a series of punched cards which permitted shuttles to move in a predetermined pattern to produce the design. The designs are made in one long ribbon and then cut from the strip as needed. This method is commonly used today to make clothing labels, ribbons and fine silk fabrics. A foremost producer of WWII German insignia using this method was the firm Bandfabrik Ewald Vorsteher. Today, in the world of insignia, the term "BEVo" is synonymous with this type of construction. (Illustration #5)

Illustration #6

With the rise in computer technology, patches are produced today in greater quantity and accuracy than ever before. The small machines can produce from one to twenty pieces at a time using multiple heads which eliminates the necessity of rethreading the needles for color changes. By using computers, it is possible to have registration of color and accuracy of design repeated in every patch in a production run. (Illustration #6)

There are several methods used to finish the edges of patches to prevent the embroidery from unraveling. If the patch is cut from felt, there is normally no finishing and the edges are left raw. In the single needle type, it is common for the stitch to continue around the perimeter of the patch. (Illustration #7) The same is true of hand stitched designs.

Illustration #7

For schiffli made patches, it is normal for the direction of the perimeter stitch to simply be turned perpendicular to the main body stitch. (Illustration #8) This would in effect lock in the stitches and prevent raveling. The entire patch design would then be cut from the main bolt of fabric and the process was completed. This is called a "cut" edge.

Illustration #8

In the 1950's, The Merrow Sewing Machine Company developed a machine that would make a heavy overlock stitch around the outer perimeter of a patch. This stitch would produce an edge that would not unravel despite rough handling. (Illustration #9) This "merrowing" has become the standard method of finishing edges and is seen on almost all military patches made since the mid-1960's.

Base fabrics upon which the embroidery is done have also changed during the years. Originally, natural fibers were used - cotton, wool, and linen. This continued until the late 1930's and the development of man-made fibers. At this point, it became less expensive to use newly developed polyesters or a blend instead of pure natural products. Later, many manufacturers came to use a blended polyester base because of the advantages of being colorfast and having minimal shrinkage.

This is also true of the colored thread used to make the design. In the current market, it is very difficult to find patches being embroidered with anything except a blended polyester thread. Many attempts have been made to try to determine the age of a patch through the types of manufacture, colors of thread used in the bobbin and fiber content. Other tests used are black light, burn tests, smell and taste tests. None of these are absolutely accurate in dating the manufacture of a patch. Collectors should be as knowledgeable as possible regarding the methods of manufacture and construction of patches and make their collecting decisions accordingly.

During the Vietnam War, the army changed their field uniform from the familiar OD fatigue uniform that had been standard since WWII to the now familiar Battle Dress Utility (BDU) camouflaged field uniform. On the new uniform, the brightly colored unit patches tended to defeat the camouflage effect desired. It was then decided to make all patches in two fashions. One in the standard colors and another for wear only on the new BDU's. The new patches were in shades of black and olive green in order to blend with the uniform. Although the colors are different, the methods of construction are the same as other patches.

Down through the years since knights painted their crests on their shields to identify themselves to friend and foe alike, man has sought to gain recognition not only as to who they are, but also as to what they are. Thus has come the idea of using colored bits of cloth and metal worn on clothing not only as personal identification but also to indicate the quality of his service in whatever endeavor he has embraced. The shoulder patch is a perfect embodiment of this need. It is little wonder that this small item has proven its value in filling a basic human need. If you are a collector, I hope that you have as much enjoyment as I have had over the last fifty years. Happy Collecting!

UNUSUAL FACTS ABOUT INTERESTING PATCHES

Reasons why some patches are designed the way they are.

Third Army

At the end of WW I, the US Third Army was assigned as "The Watch on the Rhine" in the Army of Occupation in Germany. When a request for a patch design was made, it was decided that they would incorporate the letters "A" and "O" (Army of Occupation) in the design along with the national colors of red, white and blue.

During the American Civil War, Corps in the Union army were indicated by a series of geometric shapes in order to simplify identification in battle. These shapes were usually cut from a piece of flannel and attached to the top of the kepi or to the front of the brimmed hat. The different divisions in the corps were indicated by the shape in different colors - red, white and blue for the First, Second and Third Divisions respectively. Some of these designs have survived to the present day in the forms of the I Corps and XXIV Corps

XXIV Corps

The Fourth Division uses a rebus as a basis for their design. The four leaves of ivy indicating the division number and the Roman numeral IV. Pronounced "I-V".

4th Division

The Fifth Division has a red diamond which was originally used as a baggage and vehicle marker during WW I.

The Seventh Division has 2 "7s" - one in the regular position and the other inverted making the familiar hourglass design.

27th Division

The 27th Division uses a pun on the name of its' commander, MG O'Ryan, by making the stars in the patch form the constellation Orion.

Since the 28th Division was formed with men from Pennsylvania, the keystone, which is the state symbol, was adopted for their design.

The 38th "Cyclone" division was so named because while in training in Mississippi during WW I, a storm leveled the units encampment. They promptly adopted the motto and used the letters CY to indicate the name.

38th Division

When America entered WW I, the War Department wanted a division made up of National Guard troops from many states to fight in France. The 42nd Division was formed with men from 26 states and the District of Columbia and was called the "Rainbow" division because of the variety of origins of the troop.

Perhaps the best known example of a division changing designs for political correctness belongs

45th Division
(OLD)

(NEW)

Indian symbol of the Thunderbird.

The 82nd Division patch is based on the red square and blue circle used to mark the baggage and vehicles during WW I. When troops were added from six widely separated army posts, the name "All American" was coined and the initials "AA" were added to the insignia. It became an Airborne division in 1942.

Since most of the troops in the 83rd Division during WW I were from Ohio, the patch design is an anagram of the letters O-H-I-O.

Originally called the "Texas and Oklahoma" Division, during WW I the 90th was composed of troops primarily from the two states. Therefore, the initials "T and O" in the patch design.

The 92nd Division patch design and name originated from the fact that the Indians called the Negro soldiers "Black Buffalos" when the troops dressed in the heavy buffalo robes in winter.

102d Division

Because most of the troops constituting the organization came from Missouri and Arkansas, an ingenious use of both an anagram and a rebus in patch design is the 102d "Ozark" Division. When worn correctly, the letters "O" and "Z" are quite apparent and under the "Z" is an arc. Thereby: O+Z+Arc = OZARK.

The First Special Service Force is a unique international organization which consisted of troops from both Canada and the U.S. who originally were destined for winter operations behind enemy lines. The patch used the words "USA" and "CANADA" in white on a red arrowhead and was worn by both U.S. and Canadian troops.

1st SSF

Originally, the allied planners in WW II made provisions for the invasion and liberation of Norway. To this end the 99th Infantry Battalion (Separate) was formed in 1942. The concept was to enlist only Norwegian nationals. After mountain training at

99th Inf. Bn. (SEP)

Camp Hale, Colorado the battalion was sent to England and finished the war fighting on the continent. The patch design was that of a Viking sailing ship which indicated the units native background. The colors, red, white and blue are the same for both the U.S. and Norway. When the 99th Infantry Battalion and the First Special Service Force (which included former Rangers) were inactivated, the 474th Infantry Regiment was born, which later became the 74th Regimental Combat Team. This new unit was designated to go to Norway to assist in the immediate post-hostilities repatriation of Axis forces. The patch was a composite of the red arrowhead from the First SSF, the Viking ship from the 99th and the Ranger scroll. This patch is also encountered with a blue arrowhead. There is no evidence that this was ever authorized so it exists as a novelty and was quite possibly a manufacturers' error.
